Teaism on Tea

There are two remarkable things about tea:

1. The simplicity and ease of the tea-making process - all you need is a vessel and hot water;
2. The incredible diversity of the tea product. From a single plant, Camellia Sinensis, come so many different flavors and aromas, from a spinachy Sencha to a malty Assam.

Here at Teaism we celebrate the classic teas, offering the finest product available, steering clear of the trend to corrupt teas with oils and essences.

About Teaism

Teaism is an Asian-style tea house with three critically acclaimed restaurants in Washington, DC and a small space at Union Market. We have been operating since 1996.

Teaism produces simple, healthy, and delicious foods from the cuisines of tea. We strive to source our foods sustainably and locally as much as possible.

Tea Tips for brewing the perfect cup

- Freshness is essential. Tea's enemies are light, heat, strong odors, air, and moisture. Store tea in a tight-sealing, opaque container.
- Use filtered or bottled water. While your kettle heats, warm your tea pot & cups with hot water.
- Water temperature matters. Use boiling water (212 F) for black teas, water at 180-195 F for oolongs, and 160-180F for greens & whites.
- For the quantity of tea use a teaspoon if the leaf is small and dense like most blacks & greens; if the leaf is large and wiry like oolongs & whites, use two teaspoons. Measure tea directly into the pot or a roomy infuser basket.
- Brewing time varies according to the tea type. Generally, the smaller the leaf, the shorter the brewing time. Try steeping green teas 3-5 minutes, black teas 3-4 minutes, white teas 5 minutes, and oolongs 5-7 minutes. Swirl the pot before pouring. To prevent oversteeping and bitterness, pour off the tea or remove the leaves.
- Some teas, oolongs for example, are good for several infusions. Add more hot water, increasing the steep time with each subsequent infusion.
- All tea has less caffeine per cup than coffee. Green tea has less than oolong, which has less than black. White tea has the least amount of caffeine.
